

Media coverage of Ukraine's crisis: War for people's minds

It now is evident that Ukraine has been noted on the world's map by a vast majority of Americans. From "somewhere near Russia," it has moved to "between Russia and the European Union" – and this awareness happened thanks to coverage in all renowned national and local media in the United States and beyond. Since December, Ukraine's political crisis has shown how some media play with information and how journalism is dependent on geopolitics.
